1. Technical Field The present disclosure relates to material distribution systems and methods of use. More particularly, the present disclosure relates to a material distribution system for allowing a user to select materials from a plurality of different geographic locations while maintaining the ordered nature of the materials.

2. Description of Related Art Today, there are a number of different ways in which a user can purchase materials. For example, a user can purchase goods from a large commercial store such as a warehouse club store. The user must wait in long lines, find the store, travel to the store, etc., often before being able to buy the desired materials. Additionally, the user will have no way to know the store's inventory and wait time. Some online purchasing sites may use the same technique. For example, a user may purchase goods from an online retailer and then wait to receive the goods in the mail. Or a user may purchase goods from an online retailer, pick up the goods at an office, and then return the goods to the office to be picked up by the user. These methods are often burdensome to a user. Additionally, a user may not have the ability to place a large order of goods, and thus may not be able to capitalize on the savings and efficiencies that could be achieved through large purchases of goods. Accordingly, there is a need in the art for an improved material distribution system that allows a user to purchase materials at a desired location that is convenient for the user. Additionally, there is a need in the art for an improved material distribution system that enables a user to place an order of materials that can be delivered to a desired location at the desired time.

Abnormal distribution of serum bilirubin in patients with juvenile perforating collagenosis: a diagnostic guide. A distinct distribution of serum bilirubin (SBL) levels in patients with juvenile perforating collagenosis (JPCL) has been established. The study examined the clinical and laboratory characteristics and performed correlation analyses of SBL and various serum enzymes in this disease. Results demonstrated that SBL in JPCL was abnormally distributed, being markedly depressed or abnormal in concentration, which may help distinguish JPCL from neonatal hyperbilirubinemia. SBL, alkaline phosphatase (ALP), and gamma glutamyl transpeptidase (GGT) appear to be serum marker for the diagnosis of JPCL. SBL concentrations correlated well with the severity of the disease, measured by exocrine pancreatic insufficiency (EPS) or the numbers of the apical perforations on the duodenal mucosa. The analysis of enzyme levels by clustering revealed three subtypes of JPCL characterized by EPS, no EPS, or both EPS and no EPS.Q: Can I make "to" singular and "to" plural without changing the meaning? Windows.Â .Iliofemoral venous thrombosis, venous thromboembolism and risk of cancer: a critical review of the literature. Several studies have suggested that venous thromboembolism is associated with an increased incidence of cancer, although the magnitude of the effect is not clear. Differences in the incidence of cancer between patients with and without thrombosis could be explained by two independent mechanisms: (1) biological effects of the thrombus (e.g. antiphospholipid antibodies); and (2) a passive "recruitment" of cancer at the level of the vessel by the embolic thrombus. Both could contribute to the development of cancer as a result of the interruption of the blood flow. In the second scenario, the increased incidence of cancer would not be explained by a passive mechanism as venous thrombosis is generally not a fatal event. The purpose of this review is to summarize the available evidence regarding the link between venous thromboembolism and cancer. Relevant studies published up to December 2011 were identified in Medline and Embase using the following search keywords: cancer, venous thrombosis, upper extremity deep vein thrombosis, pulmonary embolism, lower extremity deep vein thrombosis, and venous thromboembolism. Cohort studies examining the relationship between venous thromboembolism and incidence of cancer that are not descriptive or pooled data-analysis studies are included. Overall, the available literature suggests that there is an association between venous thromboembolism and overall cancer. In the majority of the studies, the magnitude of the association ranged from a 3-fold increase in overall cancer risk to a 10-fold increase.

However, specific cancers were less commonly reported. The available evidence suggests a potential link between venous thromboembolism and cancer. Further studies are needed to better elucidate the magnitude of this association. Now that Congress has passed a tax
