To further investigate the diagnostic value of determination of lactate dehydrogenase (LDH) isoenzyme-1 in sera of patients with dystrophic and nondystrophic muscular disorders, the activity of LDH was measured in sera of 121 patients and compared with the results of muscle biopsy and electromyography (EMG) of the patients' muscles. The most striking feature of the results is that the enzyme activity in sera of patients with muscular dystrophy (MD) was significantly lower than in sera of patients with neurogenic disorders (ND). There was a gradual decrease of LDH activity in the sera of patients with MD and this was more apparent at high levels of enzyme activity. The LDH activity in sera of patients with MD was always lower than in sera of healthy controls. A serum LDH activity of at least 400 U/l seems to be a useful diagnostic criterion for MD, as 72% of patients with muscular dystrophy (both dystrophic and non-dystrophic) had LDH activities below this level. The diagnostic importance of LDH activity was further illustrated by the fact that there was a considerable overlap in serum LDH activities of patients with MD and ND. Serum LDH activities in some ND patients fell within the range of LDH activity in sera of patients with MD. However, it is unlikely that the discrepancy in serum LDH activity in patients with MD and ND can be explained by overlapping affection of the skeletal muscle and the central nervous system. Further studies on patients with dystrophy and ND must be made to delineate the diagnostic value of serum LDH activity.Q: Can I change the name of the appended image in html?
