The level of the DNA-antibodies was studied by indirect immunofluorescence in the circulating immune complexes (CIC) in the blood sera of the patients with hepatitis B virus infection. The IgM antibodies against a DNA molecule extracted from the bacterium Escherichia coli have been isolated from CIC by an immunoabsorption procedure. The antigen was used in two modes: native DNA and a denatured one obtained by incubation of DNA at 60 degrees C in 6 N-NaOH, pH 12, for 15 min, respectively. The final concentration of the DNA-antibodies in the serum of the blood donors was 0.12-0.19 units/ml. The level of the IgM antibodies against the native DNA increased significantly in the sera of patients with chronic hepatitis B. The high concentration of IgM antibodies against the native DNA of the bacterium E. coli has been found in the patients with a history of blood transfusions. It is assumed that this finding reflects the rise of anti-DNA-antibodies in the blood of the patients undergoing the immunosuppression. The simultaneous increase of
