retractor of the class used in safety belt systems for the restraint of the seat occupant typically includes a buckle which, when uncoupled, engages the tongue of the seat belt and thus at least partially holds the belt in a stowed position. Once the seat occupant is seated, the buckle is disengaged and the belt is automatically withdrawn from the stowed position and routed over a door frame, upwardly across the face of the seat and downwardly to the buckle that the occupant pulls down into an initial webbing engaging position, or the like. The belt is thus cinched about the occupant. A seat belt retractor of this type is disclosed in the U.S. Pat. No. 4,516,397 assigned to the assignee of the present invention. Typically, a latch pin is used to releasably lock the tongue in the buckle and the buckle in the latch pin. In these prior art retractors, the pins are rotated into the latch by a lock pin that is moved into locking engagement with the pin by a lock release pin that is rotated into an unlocked position by an unlatched striker. In this type of system, the unlatched striker, on actuation of the latch release, is moved by inertia into engagement with the lock release pin to thereby lock the pin into engagement with the corresponding latch pin. The occupant must then grasp the handle of the seat belt retractor and move the handle through the seat belt path to release the retractor. A recent trend has been to provide a seat belt retractor in which the unlatched striker is not moved by inertia into engagement with the lock release pin, but is instead raised to an unlatched position that is maintained by a latched striker that is locked into position by movement of the lock pin into locking engagement with the latch pin and by a latch release brake which overrides movement of the latched striker into engagement with the lock release pin. The striker is held by the latch release brake at the unlatched position until an occupant unlocks the door, actuates the latch release, and moves the handle. The latch release brake holds the striker at the unlatched position until the retractor is released, and allows movement of the striker to the
