"Becoming an expert: how.Q: In a question, how many answers should be acceptable? I have noticed in a while that people try to answer very quickly, without having taken the time to read the whole question. In these cases, it is not such a bad idea to ask for clarifications, but some people do not seem to want to do this. The problem is, when a user has an answer to their question, but a better answer comes along while they are writing their answer, they tend to delete their answer, (even if it was much better than the one they are answering) and not to accept the improved answer instead, as they might think the question has been solved. If they do not accept the answer, the one they provided will not get any votes. As a result, the question is made "Unanswered", and the poor user ends up paying for someone else's mistake. How should one think of this? Should one consider something like the number of answerers, or should one consider the correct answer? How do most people think of this? A:
