What's new:

Book Henry's Day Book consists of ten books, each a year in length, that are written in the form of a diary kept by Henry Mills Thornton Young, a farmer, in August of 1855. The first edition of the day book was made by the Stonington Historical Society in 1994, though the diary was based on Thornton's original journal. It is a claimed "first volume" for a work in an 1855 diary form, and it is related to Thornton's other diaries, especially The Deeds of the Incredible Mills. Henry's Day Book is the main story of the Mills Saga, and the subject of the first six books, with the seventh book continuing the story and covering the following two years of the diary. Setting After the death of his son William Young from scarlet fever in 1852, Henry Thornton Mills Young, then a farmer, became a recluse for many years. The diaries are from August 1855 to April 1857, near the end of his life. It was after this death that the character in the diary of another man assumed Henry's name; Henry Mills Young was terminally ill until his death in 1888. Henry's most frequent residence was his own log cabin that he built from scratch. As his career on a 400-acre farm in Stonington, Connecticut, proceeds in age the log cabin that Henry shares with his family and hired help gradually grows in size and sophistication. During this period, Henry Mills Young shares his thoughts, hopes, fears, and thoughts with his new friend, Henry's Day Book, through a diary he keeps in his own secret diary. Plot summary The day book starts with many general entries, including musings on the weather and observations on animals. After that is an account of the departure of Henry from his mother's house at August 14, 1855. His vacation leave is after his wife dies from giving birth to a son. He takes his only son, Johnny, to New York City to attempt to make a living as a teacher. He succeeds on Wall Street but eventually suffers a financial setback after losing a lawsuit, and decides not to return to Stonington. Henry and Johnny take to the road and eventually arrive in New Hampshire in December 1855. Upon arrival, Henry gets a job as a blacksmith for E. G. Lewis, living in East Brookfield. It was in East Brookfield that Henry Mills Young finds out that his friend Henry's
