This is the Story of the aerial refueling tanker aircraft that helped free US prisoners held in Iran during the 1979 hostage crisis. On April 22, 1979, moments after President Jimmy Carter ordered U.S. Marine aircraft to strike an Iranian air base in retaliation for an Iranian raid on a U.S. Navy war ship, aerial refueling tankers from the 11th Air Force started circling the skies over Tehran. The tankers were in the air for more than 18 hours. During their stopover, the tankers supplied the Marine Corps aircraft with about 600,000 pounds of fuel. The tankers' ability to stay aloft day and night in the punishing, needle-nosed heat, keeping everyone cool and supplied with food and water, helped persuade the White House to order a full-scale rescue operation. The operation, code-named "Persian Freedom," was one of the most daring and complex covert operations ever undertaken by the U.S. government. As envisioned by U.S. military planners who took charge of the operation, this was to be a hard-fought victory, with a prolonged and uncertain outcome, but with every available combat aircraft available in the air and on the ground being employed to secure a series of prisons, carrying U.S. and Iranian hostage occupiers as prisoners. The U.S. was able to free all but five of the hostages, and rescue teams were able to save a total of 63 of the 85 Americans who were held captive in Iran. More than 100 deaths were attributed to the rescue operation. By order of the White House, no details of it were publicly released until October 1981, when a special presidential commission was assembled to investigate. The Doolittle Raid Flyover In April 1942, Americans were preparing their nation for a long war, and the legendary Doolittle raid against the Japanese homeland was called "Mission Number One." The squadron of 16 veteran B-25 Mitchell bombers took off from the bleak base at Hickam Field in Oahu, punched through the overcast skies of the Pacific, and headed for the Japanese mainland. As the fog parted, the air over Chichijima Island in Honshu suddenly turned bright with fire. Smoke billowed across the area, and turbocompressor units went into overdrive, forcing air into heating units, which now began to turn hot and smoke-filled. The B-25s were coming down out of an overcast sky. In a perfect
