However, we appreciate that it may not be a valid expectation for other virulence genes that can cause phenotypic changes in the cell. However, this finding does strengthen our conclusion that T7SS possesses a plasmid maintenance trait that we, however, do not have a handle to functionally test. Our data also provide a solid evidence that can be used to explain the phenotypic presentation of typhoid during infection that is characterized by the presence of VSL#3-like serum-insoluble O-Ag on the bacterial surface and subsequently the presence of flagella as well as loss of VPI-0451, which are the genetic markers indicative of presence of Salmonella in the blood. We suggest that in addition to the non-encapsulated strains of S. Typhi that
