Photoshop cc 2010 Update For Windows 7Q: How to handle duplicate data in Azure Table storage I am creating one web app with multiple tenants. Each tenant may have their own entity structure. In my web app I will be receiving the same entity data from multiple tenants but I need to always map the data into a single schema so that it makes sense. I also don't want to maintain schema similarity among various tenants. My current approach is to construct a custom Entity Model that will be used by the web app. What my approach is, is to have the Entity Model for each tenant and then pass the entity data to my custom model and then use an ORM that supports entity inheritance such as Entity Framework and Entity Generators such as EntityFramework Reverse POCO Generator and Entity Generator to map the entities into the entity model. The problem with this approach is, each tenant entity model will have the same properties and then their entities will inherit from some entity base class (that is shared) which in turn has the same properties. I am thinking of having a single shared Entity Class for my entities, but I don't know if this is a good idea. Has anyone thought about this approach? How can I deal with the duplicate data in table storage (or any other storage) in an optimal way? A: There are two different approaches to consider for this: Maintain separate schemas (at the same time), at the client side, but re-synchronise with the current master schema when the client changes its model. Implement an ETL service that performs the synchronization between different entities in different schemas. We have chosen the first approach because it works great and it allows us to
