Look at it this way: When you start a new adventure it's always at a point where you don't know where it's going. With web development, you get this constant progress. Each week, you start with a new project and then you add new features every week. With video games it's like you're putting all the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle together and waiting for it all to make sense. When the game is ready to come out, you can just show the publishers your progress at GDC (while not allowing them to make any final decisions on the game), and they'll get it into their hands when it's ready. This is way more efficient, way less stressful, and way more effective. I feel like I might have been a little bit too vague on this. Reason #2: I'm writing a book.
