Product Description: The GOEGEN MOTOR® LADIES SLIDE Â® is a motorized slide that uses remote. Comparison of the results of the mini-CEA, CEA and the Glasgow prostate protocol. The results of the 20 min CEA according to the Glasgow protocol were compared to a CEA and a mini-CEA in 134 patients in order to determine whether the mini-CEA is as accurate as the CEA. Both the CEA and the mini-CEA were performed simultaneously with a serum creatine phosphokinase activity of 200 U. Quantitative analysis was made using the same standardized templates for the CEA and the mini-CEA. The mean mini-CEA values were less than both the CEA and the mean serum creatine phosphokinase activity. The error in CEA determination ranged from -20 to +40% compared to the serum creatine phosphokinase activity. The error in the mini-CEA ranged from -15 to +25%. The difference between the values of the two tests was usually not significant for the CEA. It was significant for the mini-CEA which, however, gave only a false positive error. The CEA and the mini-CEA are both reliable in the non-selected patient group. When the serum creatine phosphokinase activity exceeds 200 U the CEA and mini-CEA must be performed together, or the mini-CEA must be performed before the CEA.Q: Inheritance of private members - is this good practice? I have a class called FileWriter that has some public and protected members. However, I would like some of its members to only be accessible to subclasses that are extending from it. I was wondering if it was good practice (using Java) to mark the members as private, so that only subclasses can inherit them? Thank you. A: If it is appropriate (e.g. if you want to control access by

I have a multi-language application which has an entity object which has an attribute called UserName. It is by default set to use the model's name in the table. I have now changed it to use the user's name, but have this lead to some problems. Say I have a user called Matthew, and his name in the DB is Matt. If I define this: `public class Entity { [Required, DisplayName("Username"), Description("The user's name")] public string UserName { get; set; } }` I get a validation error: UserName is required. Because I am using the user's name, that field is no longer required. What is the best way to deal with this? Do I need to change my Entity type to a POCO and ignore the validation rule? That seems too harsh and unnecessary. A: I think you need to change the validation rule to be `DataType` and `DataTypeString`. `DataType` is the type of the value that is required. `DataTypeString` is a string representation of the data type, and it is used for displaying and validation. More information about the validation rules here: Data Annotation Validation on MSDN Q: A linked list implementation in Java I am trying to create my own linked list implementation in Java. I have created the `LinkedList` class and the `LinkedListNode` class as the basis of the implementation. I cannot get the head and tail calls to work. So the head points to the end of the list and tail points to the beginning of the list. Here is my main method: `public class LinkedList { private LinkedListNode head; private LinkedListNode tail; public void addFirst(int item) { head = new LinkedListNode(item, null, null); } public void addLast(int item) { tail = new LinkedListNode(null, null, null); } 6d1f23a050`
