Today, in the European Court of Justice, Microsoft is arguing that the EU has to change its ruling against the company. Essentially, the EU wanted Microsoft to provide interoperability on all operating systems, which the company refused to do, and lost against in court. This decision has resulted in some highly irritating things in Windows Vista, a lot of which Ars staffers have experienced first hand. The new restriction didn't affect normal business users, but attempted to lock out free software so that Microsoft could charge extra for the interoperability (while also making money through other transactions) That's the part that affects us at Ars. If you're a reader from other parts of the world, you may not have these problems, so we've broken down the issues and what it means for readers below. Using open source software In a nutshell, the new ruling means that you can use Windows Vista on any machine, but you will only be able to do that if it has a genuine copy of Windows Vista (
