Curtis started his career with a camera and a camera alone. He traveled the globe photographing the people and cultures of many countries. His projects captured the Native Americans in all their forms and costumes and produced a series of images, acclaimed across America and beyond, that are considered to be as iconic as the American landscape itself. One of the most prolific photographers of his era, Curtis photographed thousands of subjects, from elephants in the wild to the skyscrapers of San Francisco, and from the looming chaos of the western frontier to the beauty of the Japanese teahouses of Hokkaido. His images have become iconic elements of Americana. A large collection of over 11,000 images - some of the most important of Americana - has been acquired by the Archives of American Art, thanks to the generosity of the Edward S. Curtis Foundation. As the first director of the foundation, Jack Gould has organized this landmark donation, which includes images from all of Curtis's travels and projects. The Edward S. Curtis Foundation was also a major financial supporter of the Archives' exhibitions and catalogues. For over 70 years, we've been transforming the Archives of American Art into the world's leading authority on the history of art in the United States. The Collections are a treasure trove of the nation's art history, the fruit of 4,200 years of American art production and the world's largest collection of American art. Recently expanded to house exceptional art, manuscripts, rare books, archives, and historic American art objects, the Collections are a rich resource for scholars, students, and everyone else interested in art and culture in the United States. See what Curtis and his fellow photographers captured in their travels and so many cultures around the world. Understanding the everyday cultures, scenes, and colors of places throughout the world is an integral part of who we are, as Americans. In

The court below ruled that the assignment was for a fair consideration, but, in support of this ruling, declared that the finding that it was not in consideration of past services was based upon an erroneous view of the law, and the recitals of the assignment support such view, when taken in connection with other evidence. The assignment recited that the petitioner *79 had for the period from November 15, 1921, to March 31, 1922, "rendered important and valuable services to said Institute" in the manner hereinbefore described.
