Heres a tutorial in C++ for creating a chunking system, though youll probably want to go back to the first step and find out if Blueprint nodes have a way to even generate the mesh for a single block. If so you should be able to pull off converting this tutorial to Blueprints just fine, itll be slow but itsll add up acceptably on modern hardware, especially at the early stages of testing. The Blueprint Pack takes inspiration from traditional art forms and processes as well as the beautiful black and white world of the videogame and the pixel art movement. Its meant to be reminiscent of the beautiful landscape of the videogame and the Beauty of the blue paper and the game Pixel-art world. Ill admit right now im not an expert at blueprint. I just started doing blueprints like 2 or 3 months ago. I originally started making the maps like a long time ago when I first got into game dev. What inspired me to make this pack of maps in the first place was the need to have variations of a map. This meant I needed to make these wall art in different colors or terrains. I am really proud of the work I made and Im pretty pleased with it, to be honest its the first map I ever created. Im still learning how to use blueprint though, and I would like to improve on the maps in the future for better realism and processing speed. Like I said I dont know a lot about blueprint, and i am currently trying to learn the process from scratch, though with the help of an online guide I found, i was able to get up to what I had just enough from what I looked at from past tutorials and tutorials that I was made where I decided to attempt and publish a tutorial for some basic tutorials and explanations of some great material for this art form.
