The echo command is made available in Ubiquity for users to quickly create PDF-formatted files from Ubiquity documents. PrinttoPDF, which is a Java application, writes a PDF document to the default printer, and the user can close the document and retrieve the PDF file. Using a script, the echo command will have more options than just echoing the selected text. The echo command can be used to filter things out of the command arguments to echo. For example, if you echo a document from Ubiquity, it will print out its actual title, but if you filter out the document title using echo, it will just print out the title. If you only want to echo a document to PDF, you can do it one of two ways.

You can use the printtoPDF tool, which will create a PDF of the selected document. The second method is to run the echo command in a script, which allows you to keep track of the documents you want to print to PDF and whether or not you want to convert them to PDF (if you only need to print them to PDF, you don't want the document converted). You can echo a document from Ubiquity to PDF by running the echo command in a Ubiquity terminal. It will ask for your password, as it does when printing to PDF. The echo command and its options will need to be exported to a script that will capture the document and print it to PDF. The echo command also has options for how it prints the document. If you echo some text to PDF, you will see the echo command's options in effect. For example, if you have the option `-split enable`, then the text is displayed one word per line when printed to PDF. You can also echo multiple documents to PDF by separating them with a comma, like this: `echo -split enable,document1,document2 document3,document4 document5`.
