At its summit in April, Apple announced Apple Watch, the first "smart" watch, then subsequently released iOS 9, which turns it into an A-list smartwatch. It's not enough to stick a fitness-tracking band onto the wrist, according to Apple; the watch must also make it possible to control the phone with voice commands and a knowledge of status symbols. The watch itself looks kind of absurd, and not only because you slide a phone onto your wrist or tie a thin band around it, but also because it's touch-based. This probably comes as little surprise, then, for the various touch-screen-based software products that Apple released last year and the year before. But today, on the other side of the pond, Microsoft launched Windows 10, its touch-based new OS, together with the Surface Pro 4. Microsoft's tablet was previously its most tablet-like part, but with this new Surface Pro 4 its performance has only been pushed to new heights. Even more important than the "smart" features of the watch, iPhone and the Surface Pro 4 prove that integration across the hybrid transformations is feasible. In terms of Windows 10, it was partly a reaction to the other A-list smartwatch, the Apple Watch, but Microsoft is not behaving like a copycat. They are creating software for a different category. The tech world tends to mourn mediocrity when a middle-ground solution appears to offer something it didn't have. We get excited when people are excited about the future again. This is a good moment. And this is a good moment for Microsoft, too.
