Some of the updates to the iOS and iPad versions were announced at Adobe Max 2017, and we won't get into those in this review, but here's a look at some of the features for Windows, now in beta for both the desktop and mobile versions. It has new features, including the option to resave project files using the same version (e.g., you can create version 001 in one session and then save again as version 010 with no re-compilation, so you'll wind up with two versions of the same file). Overall, it's a great update, one of the best in recent memory. The new features in AI, which is supposed to make editing a lot less of a chore, take work for the user, too, but they're worth the effort, and the new features show this is a great release. ABOVE: The Third person view in the Specular Reflection popover. You can't see it here, but notice how the red highlights also show where the light maps in the reflection. BELOW: Specular Reflection was implemented with three new options in the popover (eventually it will support more) -- Highlights Highlights Specular Highlights Techs. Each of these (from left to right) can be turned on or off for each Reflection Reflection panel, affecting the colors in that area. BELOW: An example of a photo shot at a tough location in Los Angeles. BELOW: After applying the Reflection Reflection filters, a view of the view shown above with Highlights turned on. You can also use the new Assistive Cloud features to bring up Cloud Drive content directly in a photo, create intelligent guides where you specify which parts of your image should be masked, and even access additional filters and features in the style of Adobe Adjust (see the examples below).
